Odell Too Much Distressed to See Woman Who Called to Plead for Her Three Stepsons Condemned to Die.

(Special to The Evening World.)
ALBANY, Sept. 28.—There was a painall scene in the outer office of Gov. Odell in the Capitol Building to-day when the stepmother of the condemned Wormer boys called to make a plea for clemency. Mrs. Van Wormer wore a mourning gown and a black veil, although the boys will not put to death until Thursday.

She came from Kinderhook to Albany on a trolley car and was met by her cousin, Mrs. Isaac Van Slyck, who escorted her to the Capitol. She was too agitated to write her name on the card presented to her by Orderly O'Conner, but he knew who she was and went in to tell the Governor of her arrival.

There were tears in the Governor's eyes as he eat at his desk and looked at the card. He knew the mental condition of the overwrought woman, and he knew that to allow her to plead with him would make a bad matter worse, for he has concluded that the boys must

"One word from the Governor," she walled, "one stroke of his pen and my poor boys need not die. They did not commit the crime. The one who did it s safe."
Mrs. Van Slyck urged that Mrs. Van Wormer be allowed to see the Governor, aying that she would always be hauntd by the conviction that she had not

The sobs of Mest Van Wormer resounded through the great corridors as he made her way to the elevator and hence to the street. She will start for bannemora to-night to bring home the solder of the boys if permission is Unique in Criminal History. Since this is the first time in the history of the State that three brothers have been condemned to die at the same time the case has attracted wide interest. Should Warden Deyo accommodate all who wish to witness the ex-ecution it would become necessary to hold it in the prison yard, and even there the crowd would overflow the accommodations. Requests for invitations have come from all over the State, from cago. Already there are visitors in this leak little city drawn by the morbid desire to be at least in the vicinity of an unprecedented event.

There is an ordeal more horrible than the chair ahead of Burton Van Wormmer-the ordeal of waiting. Penned in this cell with a black screen shutting out from his view the actions of those around him, he will hear the soft shuffling of sandalled feet, the whisper of a priest, the clang of a door and in his mind he can see one of his brothers being done to death. Then the door will clang again, there will be more shuffling of feet, more whispers, another clanging and in his mind Burton Van Wormerstan sees of the other side of the wall another brother dying.

At last the screen will be turned aside of the wall another brother dying.

At last the screen will be turned aside, attendants will catch him by the arms, a quick slash of a sharp knife down his trousers leg will bare the flesh, a crucifix will be thrust into his trembling hands, and with the priest supporting him with words of hope he will be led into the little execution room to face the circle of white, strained faces and the monstrous, terrifying chair that will have already claimed the lives of his brothers.

getting supplies in to him. She, however, was not allowed to return. When an Evening World reporter went to the Pacific street house this morning Murray talked from the winlow of his flat.

Suddenly a black-gowned woman wearing a stylish brown hat started cross the street and Murray called out to her. It was Mrs. Murray. She assured her husband that his troubles were almost over.

"Don't you worry. You will soon be ut of there. Are you hungry?" she with his wife, wrote notes which he wrapped about bits of wood and threw to the sidewalk. "My husband is a carpenter and had been working on a Manhattan school until the strikes threw him out of work. We got behind in our rent and the landlady refused to let us take our furniture. They have cut off the water and the gas, and we have been in a terrible condition. Saturday I determined to escape and appeal to the law. My husband has been in the house keeping watch. Mrs. Brown has put a new combination on the front door, so I can't get into my husband, nor will she let any of my friends visit him. Eut he is determined to hold the fort and not give up the furniture." Civil action was begun to-day and Counsellor Nicholas, Murray's lawyer, ad a hard time communicating with his client. Murray was still at the third-story window and the lawyer was refused admittance. Finally Murray let down a string and the lawyer sent up some legal documents for him to
